Subject: Peace and Justice Commission Communication to Berkeley City Council: Support PRC-Proposed Charter Amendment for a New Police Commission

We are pleased to support the Police Review Commission (PRC) proposal for a charter amendment to strengthen civilian police oversight, while maintaining the authority of the City Council.¹ We urge Council to put the PRC's version of the charter amendment for a new Police Commission on the November ballot.

It is gratifying to observe the broad and passionate interest in police accountability in Berkeley, which has so far produced four distinct charter amendment proposals just this year. This interest is testament to the local and national consciousness raising impelled by the Black Lives Matter movement over the past several years.

Of the two charter amendment proposals now before Council, the PRC draft more clearly paves the way for effective and useful community oversight for Berkeley policing. It therefore better promotes a partnership between the police department and the community it serves.

Key among the important elements distinguishing the PRC version are that it:

- 1) Retains the historically significant Board of Inquiry (BOI) process, created by vote of the people in 1973, the first of its kind in the country. The BOI provides a valuable voice for civilians to evaluate the treatment of the community by members of the police department.
- 2) Ensures that the staff will remain the size of the current PRC staff, allowing it the chance to succeed at the expanded responsibilities the new commission will be given.
- 3) Retains the City Council's role as elected, ultimate oversight of the police department and its policies and procedures, rather than assigning this role to city management.
- 4) Protects the commission from political interference by giving only a commissioner's Council appointer—not a bare Council majority—the power to remove the commissioner, as with every other city commission; and by authorizing the Council-appointed commission to select its own staff.

To be successful, any proposal must try to meet the needs of the full diversity of Berkeley's people. We believe the PRC proposal does so.

This proposal is a compromise that emerged after months of debate in the community between those who advocated an even stronger body similar to those in Oakland and San Francisco, and those who felt there was little need for change to the current oversight model. The PRC, whose members are each appointed directly by a member of the City Council, held many public meetings and crafted the proposed charter amendment in a collaborative workshop mode, finally adopting the proposal unanimously.

We believe that it is important to see social issues through the eyes of people we disagree with. In this way, we can begin a discourse about policing that is more civil, more productive, and less polarized.

For example, even in Berkeley, we see very different perspectives about the BPD within the Black and White communities. Beyond the national conversation about race and policing,² the disparate views also stem from a current racial disparity in police stops, searches, and use of force, shown in the BPD's own data and confirmed in the recent report by the Center for Policing Equity³ and a PRC report.⁴

We understand also that police officers have due process rights, that their work is vital to the community's safety, and that they daily place themselves in harm's way. The PRC proposal maintains their due process rights. To do otherwise would be illegal. It would also perpetuate the false dichotomy between civil liberties and civil rights, on the one hand, and public safety and fair treatment for city employees.

This moderate, good-governance initiative is not anti-police and certainly not soft on crime. Strengthened public oversight of the police is a public benefit and increases the legitimacy of and trust in the police, leading to a more cooperative relationship between community and law enforcement.

We hope that the whole community can come together to support the PRC proposal, which increases accountability for the police department while maintaining public safety and impartial policing for all.
